POLICE TREATMENT OF MIGRANTS AND THE CHALLENGE OF TRAINING ON HUMAN RIGHTS AND MULTICULTURAL POLICING
The case of Greece and Cyprus

Author: Alexia Nikomani
Supervisors: As. Prof. Aristoteles Constantinides and As. Prof. Kalliope Agapiou-Josephides
Abstract

This research is examining whether or not and to which extent, Greek and Cypriot police forces get a proper and adequate training on human rights and multicultural policing.

The first part of the research outlines the legal framework and the dominant perceptions concerning migrants in Greece and Cyprus. The second part is considering recorded cases of police misconduct against migrants and shortcomings in recording and addressing the racist crime and human trafficking, while also touching upon the issue of accountability and impunity. The third part is a comparative research on the systems of training on human rights and multicultural policing of the Greek and Cypriot police forces, followed by a presentation of the principles and standards on training on human rights and multicultural policing.

According to the findings, the police reflect the prejudiced and xenophobic perceptions of their respective societies and they are often abusing the rights of migrants. Human rights and multicultural policing are not included in the curricula of the Greek Police Academy, whereas the Cypriot Police Academy is undergoing constant improvements on this context. The need for reform is essential, including the importance of committing in promoting human rights and building bridges of trust with migrant communities.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION .......................................................................................... 5

PART I: MIGRANTS, ASYLUM SEEKERS AND REFUGEES IN GREECE AND CYPRUS: AN OVERVIEW

1. Legal Framework and General Concerns................................................. 10
2. Criminalisation of migration and securitisation ..................................... 14
3. Racism, xenophobia and discrimination against migrants......................... 19
   3.1. The perceived impact of migration in the economy ......................... 20
   3.2. The rise of political extremism: migrants as “enemies to the nation” .......... 21
   3.3. Perceptions of migration by the police ........................................ 24

PART II: POLICE TREATMENT OF MIGRANTS IN GREECE AND CYPRUS

1. Common cases of abusive treatment by the police .................................. 26
   1.1. Regular policing practices indicating racial profiling with a focus on identification checks and collective operations ........................................ 26
   1.2. Treatment of migrants during detention and deportation procedures ........ 33
      1.2.1. The case of Cyprus ......................................................... 35
      1.2.2. The case of Greece ......................................................... 40
   2. Shortcomings in addressing abuses against migrants ............................ 45
      2.1. Deficient treatment of victims of human trafficking .......................... 45
      2.2. Shortcomings in recording and investigating the racist crime .............. 49
      2.3. (Non-) Accountability for police abuses ...................................... 53

Part III: POLICE TRAINING SYSTEMS ON HUMAN RIGHTS AND MULTICULTURAL POLICING IN GREECE AND CYPRUS AND THE NEED FOR REFORM

1. Police training systems on human rights and multicultural policing in Greece and Cyprus........................................................................... 59
   1.1. The Cypriot Police Academy ..................................................... 60
1.2. The Greek Police Academy .................................................................63

2. The need for change: strengthening police training on human rights and multicultural policing .........................................................65

2.1. Integration of international guidelines and standards of human rights based policing in training manuals .........................................................66

2.2. Lessons on policing a multicultural society .......................................68

CONCLUSIONS .................................................................................................73

BIBLIOGRAPHY .................................................................................................76

ANNEX ...............................................................................................................100
Police treatment of migrants and the challenge of training on human rights and multicultural policing. The case of Greece and Cyprus

Nikomani, Alexia

https://doi.org/20.500.11825/318

Downloaded from Open Knowledge Repository, Global Campus’ institutional repository